KEY POINT #2

Scarcity: 10% of Whisky from a Single Year remains by Year 15

Most single malt scotch whiskies are bottled between three and twelve years of age. By the time 15 years have passed, about 10% of a single year's whisky remains maturing in barrel. Bottling combined with angel share loss (accounting for 2.5% loss per year) attribute to the rarity and desirability of barrels 20+ years old.

As long as whisky is in the barrel, it matures and develops additional complexity and flavors desired by whisky enthusiasts. This maturation ceases when a whisky is bottled (typically between 3 - 12 years old). Historically, this has resulted in whiskies that spend longer in the barrel being in higher demand and garnering higher prices than those bottled younger.

Vint Thesis

Ranked second in Single Malt market share (by value), only behind industry behemoth Macallan, Bowmore's whiskies have seen 418% growth in value since 2013, according to Rare Whisky 101's Bowmore Index. This offering offers the rare opportunity, not only to invest in Bowmore whisky, but in a cask that is highly sought after by independent bottlers and spirits companies, due to the fact that the whisky is still developing and maturing (something that does not occur in bottle).

In addition to different sources of demand and additional development, cask values have historically benefited from scarcity due to the fact that 90% of whisky barrels are bottled within 15 years of initial distillation. This collection leverages the brand power of Bowmore, the benefits of 20+ years of maturation, and the scarcity of supply to create a unique whisky investment opportunity.
